Objectives and Content

Content

Advanced level on the topic of inclusion and diversity at Ph.D. level:

- Diversity
- Inclusive education
- Intercultural education
- Disability theory
- Intercultural paradigm

Main learning objectives

The main course goal is to introduce Ph.D. students to some fundamental questions within the inclusion and diversity debate in contemporary research and develop their understanding of some main controversies in education.

More specifically, the Ph.D. students will develop their understanding of different approaches to the phenomenon of disability and how the diversity debate relates to the special case of disability regarding inclusion. Likewise, the Ph.D. students will develop their comprehension of how the intercultural issue pertain to inclusive education and shed light on the concept of inclusion compared to the contribution from special education. The students also will reflect on the intercultural paradigm, its content and outlines in times of climate change. In addition, the course aims to develop the Ph.D. students' abilities and knowledge for posing fundamental questions in the field of inclusion and diversity and examine issues at stake in this research field from the perspectives of intercultural and special education.

After completing the course, the Ph.D. students will have general knowledge about:

Knowledge of the research fields: disability studies in education, inclusive education in relation to diversity and the special case of disability, intercultural issues regarding inclusion in a society characterised by ethnic tensions and populism and where cultural diversity also is approached through climate change and biodiversity.

Fundamental questions within the field of intercultural and special education about conditions for good existence for humans and non-humans in a shared world.

After completing the course, the Ph.D. student will have specific knowledge about:

How to recognise and examine controversies in the research fields concerning diversity and inclusion within the topics of disability and intercultural education.

How to interpret understandings of diversity, disability, interculturality and inclusion in relation to various research traditions.

How to raise fundamental questions pertaining to the issue of diversity and inclusive education regarding the special case of disability and intercultural education.
